dynamic analysis for steel floor vibrations • the natural frequency of almost all concrete slab structural steel supported floors can be close to or can match a harmonic forcing frequency of human activities • resonance amplification is associated with most of the vibration problems that occur in buildings using structural steel using dynamic simulation to improve product design component is in dynamic equilibrium at each time step of the dynamic simulation. the stress analysis computation is performed at the considered time step without taking into account time variation of the loads. here are the steps to perform such an analysis: 1. dynamic simulation calculates joint reactions and inertial forces acting on the arm molecular dynamics simulation - stanford university

• simulations require short time steps for numerical stability – 1 time step $\approx 2 \text{ fs}$ ($2 \times 10^{-15} \text{ s}$) • structural changes in proteins can take nanoseconds (10^{-9} s), microseconds (10^{-6} s), milliseconds (10^{-3} s), or longer – millions to trillions of sequential time steps for nanosecond to millisecond events (and even more for slower the following steps: 1. define the dynamic load case (equation 1) 2. perform a time history analysis with zero initial conditions 3. analyze the time history response based on demand capacity ratio the main advantage of this procedure is its ability to account for dynamic amplification effects. this procedure is limited to structures dynamic balancing of rotating machinery experiment satisfy the need to perform field balancing of equipment easily and accurately. although there are many possible causes of vibration in rotating equipment, this technique will deal only with that component of vibration, which occurs at running speed (frequency), and is caused by a mass unbalance in the rotor.
